The TRC and ICTR have been established to investigate and prosecute those responsible for the atrocities committed.

The findings of these tribunals are an important part of the process of reconciliation and healing in South Africa.

The TRC’s mandate includes providing truth and justice for victims of apartheid and ensuring that those responsible are held accountable. It has been widely praised for its courage and determination in uncovering the truth about the past.

The ICTR’s mandate is to try those responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law in Rwanda and Burundi.

Both tribunals have been successful in bringing those responsible to justice, but they have also faced criticism for their methods and the way they have been implemented.

The legacy of apartheid continues to shape South Africa today, as the country works to address the effects of the past and build a brighter future for all its citizens.
